

Unpacking agentic capital in employability of international graduates, 22 July 2021

00:42:47 DORIA ABDULLAH: Hi Dr Pham! Followed your presentation with NUS few weeks before. Congratulations on the research. In your findings, do you see themes related to going home and contributing to communities in their home countries? [am trying to link agentic capital with concepts relating to brain drain]

00:47:06 Fenella Somerville: Were you able to ascertain the part played by their HE experience and knowledge development on agentic capital formation?

00:58:45 Soyoung Lee: Thanks for your presentation - really helpful for my research. I'm wondering what is the role of higher education in terms of developing graduates' agentic capital?

00:59:23 Soyoung Lee: Oops my question is being asked by Fenella - thanks.

01:00:34 Xiaoshi Li: How would you see the role of 'inequality' in your framework of agentic capital? To what extent do you think agentic capital can contribute to breaking the social reproduction?

01:00:36 Hong Bui: No question, but thanks Thanh for your interesting and useful research. Well done!

01:01:36 Soyoung Lee: Were there any disciplinary differences in agentic capital in your data? What about the role of mobility in exercising agentic capital?

01:05:03 Cathy Huang: Hi Dr Pham, I would like to ask how to measure the agentic features of participants in your research? Thanks.

01:12:37 Thu Do: Many thanks Dr Thanh Pham for the very interesting research project and findings. Not a question but just a comment: I really like the key take-away message relating to agentic capital and international students, that international students need to analyse strengths, weaknesses and priorities by themselves and others (especially good mentors). In this sense, I think human capital and social capital both play very important role in international students' employability in host country. Many thanks again and I very much look forward to reading your further research in this field.
