

Pandemia: The personal and professional costs of universities' response to COVID-19, 9 June 2022

00:44:52 Simon Marginson: It is time to consider your questions and statements for the Q&A section of the webinar - post them in the Chat now!

01:02:41 Sarah Honeybone: Thanks Richard, such valuable work! I have two questions: 1) why do you think there was a majority of female respondents (especially among the academics), and 2) do you plan to extend this research into what we're hearing is happening now where those who had to pivot or stop their research are struggling to get back into their research careers and will always be two years behind their less affected peers? We're picking that up a bit in the sector but have not yet heard of any practical solutions!

01:02:51 Jane Kerubo: Thanks Richard for the good presentation. Please comment on academic integrity during the pandemic .any insights from your research

01:02:58 Piers von Berg: Do these findings around the theme of fracturing suggest a greater role for organised and collective labour as a medium for solidarity, bargaining in changing times? Or does this theme suggest academics need to think of themselves as a civic body as members of a community with collective agency that assert more prosocial values over commercial ones? The question is influenced by research on work intensification (see Francis Green et al (2021)

<https://journals.sagepub.com/doi/10.1177/0019793920977850?icid=int.sj-abstract.citing-articles.1>) and interest in the idea of academics as citizens.

01:03:24 Celia Whitchurch: I was surprised that nobody mentioned the lack of serendipitous, chance meetings and conversations when face to face eg over lunch, in corridor - whereas virtual meetings have to be planned.Celia Whitchurch

01:03:53 Amrita Kulthe: Good presentation

01:04:56 Zarah Bennett: Do you have suggestions for the lobbying role of universities, implied with the hostile environment element of your research but also the ongoing climate crisis is surely going to be needed in a very robust manner. The cost of living crisis in the UK, but may well evolve in other global contexts, also feeds in to how we work and in what way.

01:05:06 Beata Borowska-Beszta: Essential research reports. Thank you

01:07:30 Victorița Trif: Thank you!

01:09:46 Marta Kozłowska: Such a valuable piece of work - thank you for sharing. Looking forward to your insights coming up from the 9-nation study. Very interesting findings on authentic leadership (in hostile environments) the role of ed tech & changing culture of working within HE.

01:10:34 Alexia Rino: Thank you soo much, I'm finishing a similar research in Brazil and was really interesting to compare the results

01:11:13 Marta Kozłowska: @ Celia Whitchurch: A great observation! I remember a colleague mentioned this as an essential element of 'work' at CERN at least 8 years ago...

01:12:31 Edmund Adam: Unionizing: interesting idea, given the fact that union membership has been on decline in most liberal market economies since 1980s. Academics would be bucking the trend!

01:16:04 Zarah Bennett: Thank you for your time and the research, the long covid element is vital as UK policy makers appear to be ignoring it

01:16:15 Ingrid Baigrie: Thank you - interesting feedback from South African academics!

01:16:43 Edmund Adam: Great webinar! Many thanks
