

Is international education ethical and political enough? Rethinking the ethics and politics of international student mobility

9 February 2023

00:44:05 David Mills: Please do start posting your questions and thoughts here ..does this resonate with your experience?

00:47:16 David Mills: All thoughts please...do post..

00:50:15 Brendan Harrison: have there been studies on this topic in other countries? if so, how do your findings compare to those studies?

00:50:26 Soyoung Lee: Thanks for your presentation. I'm curious about your thoughts and findings about the role of international students, particularly their agency, in the institutional habitus?

00:50:41 Neil Carmichael: To what extent has the recent international political turbulence impacted the flow of international, especially Chinese, students to the UK?

00:52:43 Brendan Harrison: sorry my mic doesn't work!

01:00:42 David Law: Apologies but am following this on a train and cannot speak. I would be interested to hear about your view of academic imperialism (a term you used). Thanks.

01:06:04 David Mills: Any more thoughts or questions for Jihyun?

01:06:29 Brendan Harrison: we did a study on Commonwealth Scholarship recipients who were studying graduate programmes at UK universities via distance learning, and they did report that some of their motivation for applying to these scholarships and their programmes of study were the reputations of the UK universities, and the career benefits that they could derive from earning a UK-based degree

01:06:55 David Law: Thanks very much.

01:07:12 Brendan Harrison: report can be found here if of interest:
